MONTHLY COMMENT

The stock market maintained its strong performance in October despite uncertainty caused by the government services shutdown and the resurgence of trade tensions with China earlier in the month. The rise was driven by expectations of a more accommodative monetary policy, resilient economic growth in major developed regions, and a solid earnings season, particularly in the United States. Trade agreements secured by Donald Trump during his Asian tour, especially regarding rare earths with China, boosted investor enthusiasm. Xi Jinping stated that a consensus had been reached on solutions to the issues, notably concerning the recent tensions related to tariffs. On the central banks front, only the Fed cut its key interest rates in October, while reaffirming its cautious stance regarding inflation developments. The ECB, Bank of Japan, and Bank of England kept their rates unchanged. In this context, equity markets continued their advance: the MSCI World in euros gained +4.09%, while US 10-year yields fell by 7 basis points to 4.08%. Finally, the dollar appreciated, gaining +1.70% against the euro.
